सशैलवनधात्रीणां यथाधारोऽहिनायकः ।

सर्वेषां योगतन्त्राणां तथाधारो हि कुण्डली ॥ १ ॥

Just as the lord of snakes is the foundation of the regions of the earth along with their mountains and forests, so Kuṇḍalinī is the foundation of all systems of yoga. (1)

❖ Commentary

The plural dhātrīṇām is hard to construe. Only this world has mountains and forests, but we want a plural for the comparison with tantrāṇām. Brahmānanda (Jyotsnā 3.1) understands dhātrīṇām to refer to the different regions of the earth, even though the world (dhātṛī) is a single entity (dhātryā ekatve 'pi deśabhedād bhedaṁ ādāya bahuvacanam). A similar comment occurs in the Yogaprakāśikā 5.1 (yathā samastadvīpādisahitapṛthvī ādhāraḥ phaṇīndras tathā samastayogādhāraḥ kuṇḍalīty āha saśaileti). The author of the Haṭharatnāvalī circumvented this issue by adopting the reading dhātryāḥ.

❖ Commentary

The reading of  $\alpha$  idaṃ mudrādi, is not attested by the other manuscript groups but it makes sense in so far as ‘locks’ (bandha) and ‘actions’ (karaṇa) figure among the ten techniques taught in this chapter. It is also consistent with the reference to mudrādi in 1.55. However, most manuscripts have readings, such as idaṃ hi mudrādaśakam, that refer to the techniques of this chapter as only mudrās, and this is consistent with 3.104.

❖ Commentary

The instruction to hold the breath upwards (ūrdhvataḥ) is somewhat vague. In a commentarial passage on this verse in Yuktabhavadēva 7.187, Bhavadēvamīśra clarifies this by saying, ‘one should hold it higher than the heart’ (hrdayād ūrdhvato dhārayet).

❖ Commentary

This verse is taken from the Amarauḡha, which uses the alchemical imagery of the Amṛtasiddhi to describe the stilling of Kuṇḍalinī in the central channel. Drawing on HELLWIG 2009: 238–240, MALLINSON AND SZÁNTÓ (2021: 21) note that “In alchemical texts māraṇa (“killing”) involves heating a substance and thereby changing its state, usually through calcination or oxidation, so that it becomes inert. In the Amṛtasiddhi māraṇa and other derivatives of the root mṛ, “die”, are used to denote the stilling or stopping of either the breath or Bindu.” Thus when Kuṇḍalinī is said to be in the state of marāṇa the meaning is that she is stilled. The dvipuṭa or “vessel with two halves” in which this occurs is the same as the Amṛtasiddhi’s saṃpuṭa, which, drawing on HELLWIG (2009: 342), MALLINSON AND SZÁNTÓ (2021: 22) say “consists of two puṭas joined together to form a sealed crucible for heating reagents without evaporation”. In the yoga of the Amṛtasiddhi, the bodily saṃpuṭa is formed by applying locks at the top and bottom of the central channel, i.e. constricting the perineal region and the throat. In the Haṭhapradīpikā it is formed by pressing the perineum with the heel and constricting the throat.

As BIRCH (2019: 971) notes, it is unlikely that later non-Buddhist authors understood marañāvasthā and dvipuṭa according to the alchemical metaphors of the Amṛtasiddhi. Later commentators take dvipuṭa as the two nostrils (e.g., Yuktabhavadēva 7.187, dvinaśāpuṭa); the idā and piṅgalā channels (e.g., Jyotsnā 3.27, puṭayor dvayam idāpiṅgalayor yugmam); or the in and out flows of the breath (e.g., Yogaprakāśikā 5.16–17, vāyor bahirnirgamanam antaḥpraveśa iti yat puṭadvayam tam). How these commentators understood asau marañāvasthā is less clear. Brahmānanda seems to take it as the death of prāṇa, or in other words, the absence of the breath, in the two nostrils (marañāvasthā jāyate kuṇḍalibodhe sati suṣumnāyām praviṣṭe prāṇe dvayor puṭayor prāṇaviyogāt). Bhavadēva thought that Kuṇḍalinī, along with prāṇa and apāna, remains in the two nostrils while the breath is being held (evam vāyudhāraṇāyām kriyamāṇāyām vyākulā bhūtā kuṇḍalinī apānaprāṇābhyām saha nāśāpuṭadvayāśritā bhavati). Others, such as Śivānanda and Bālakṛṣṇa, favour the reading tadā sā marañāvasthām harate dvipuṭāśritām (or dvipuṭāśrayām), which is present in group γ and δ manuscripts of the Haṭhapradīpikā. Bālakṛṣṇa understands this to mean that the great seal destroys death (marañāvasthām harate mahāmudreti bhāvah) but it could also mean that the awakened Kuṇḍalinī destroys death, which is usually dependent on the in and out breaths.

The form rjvībhūtā is non-Pāṇinian (it should be rjūbhūtā) but all witnesses have rjvī or variants thereof. α<sub>1</sub> has rjvī bhūtvā which is correct morphologically, but it does not make sense with bhavet in the next pāda and may be an attempt at correction by the scribe.

ततः शनैः शनैरेव रेचयेन्न तु वेगतः ।

[The yogi] should then exhale very slowly, not quickly. This is the great seal revealed by the great Siddhas. (13)

❖ Commentary

The terms candrāṅga and sūryāṅga are unusual and not used in other yoga texts outside the context of mahāmudrā. In Jyotsnā 3.15, Brahmananda glosses candrāṅga as vāmāṅga ('the left side of the body') and sūryāṅga as dakṣāṅga ('the right side of the body') and goes on to explain the sequence of practice as follows:

अत्रायं क्रमः । आकुञ्चितवामपादपाणिं योनिस्थाने संयोज्य प्रसारितदक्षिणपादाङ्गुष्ठमाकुञ्चिततर्जनीभ्यां गृहीत्वाभ्यासो वामाङ्गेऽभ्यासः । अस्मिन्नभ्यासे पूरितो वायुर्वामाङ्गे तिष्ठति । आकुञ्चितदक्षपादपाणिं योनिस्थाने संयोज्य प्रसारितवामपादाङ्गुष्ठमाकुञ्चिततर्जनीभ्यां गृहीत्वाभ्यासो दक्षाङ्गेऽभ्यासः । अस्मिन्नभ्यासे पूरितो वायुर्दक्षाङ्गे तिष्ठति ।

This is the sequence in the [practice]. Joining the heel of the bent left leg with the region of the perineum and holding the big toe of the extended right leg with index fingers curled [around it] is the practice, that is, the practice on the left side of the body (vāmāṅga). In this practice, the inhaled breath remains on the left side of the body. ❖ Commentary

Two readings of the second quarter are well-attested: jarāmṛtyuvinaśinī ( $\alpha_1$  etc.) and mahāsiddhikarī nṛṇām ( $\alpha_3$  etc.). While the first reading is possible, the play on mahāsiddhi and mahāmudrā seems more likely original, as seen in the source text, the Vivekamārtaṇḍa (without significant variants).

In Jyotsnā 3.18, Brahmananda understands mahāsiddhi as referring to ‘great siddhis,’ but in other works it can mean liberation (MALLINSON 2012b).

In the latter manuscripts, however, the lines are inserted after 3.21\*2ab. It seems that they were supplied from a manuscript of the  $\alpha$  or  $\delta$  group, as they are followed by 3.21 in  $\zeta_2$ .

The seated position for mahābandha described in this verse is not in the Amṛtasiddhi (chapter 12) or Amarauḡha (25cd–27). The Amṛtasiddhi instructs the same position for mahāmudrā and mahābandha, and the Amarauḡha does not comment on the posture of mahābandha, implying that its posture is the same as mahāmudrā.

❖ Commentary

The referent of madhye is uncertain. The verse is derived from the Amaraughā, and the Amṛtasiddhi makes no mention of a place to focus the mind in its treatment of mahābandha (it does however instruct the yogi to place the mind at the catuspatha in its teachings on mahāmudrā). Bhavadēvamiśra (Yuktabhavadēva 7.196), Brahmananda (Jyotsnā 3.20) and Bālakṣṇa (Yogamārgapradīpa 5.24) take it to mean the central channel. It could also plausibly mean the region between the chest and perineum, or perhaps the place between the eyebrows. At 3.23 this practice is said to make the mind reach Kedāra, which is sometimes located between the eyebrows (see MALLINSON 2007: 214 n. 285; BIRCH 2019: 967 n. 57).

This portion of the description of mahābandha has undergone various revisions in the manuscript groups. The shortest version appears in  $\alpha_1$ ,  $\alpha_2$  and  $\alpha_3$ , as well as the  $\delta$  group and the Haṭharatnāvalī, all of which omit verses 3.21\*2 and 3.22\*1cd. We have adopted the  $\alpha$  version, as it seems that 3.21–22 were reworked in a major redaction of the whole work (for further discussion, see the introduction p. 75).

❖ Commentary

This verse expresses an alternative to the application of the chin lock in mahābandha mentioned in 3.20. It is found in all groups except  $\alpha_1$  and  $\alpha_2$ , and the  $\delta$  group.

We do not find the idea of lifting up the rājadantabīla with the tongue in other works, but Vivekamārtaṇḍa 126ab instructs the yogi to press it with the tip of the tongue and Dattātreyayogaśāstra 36 (found at Haṭhapradīpikā 1.46) instructs the yogi in padmāsana to lift up the ‘root of the uvula’ (rājadantamūla) with the tongue.

This verse occurs in the Yogacintāmaṇi in the middle of a quotation attributed to Īśvara. The other verses of the quoted passage are found in the Śivasamhitā (4.37–42), but the verse in question is not reported in the critical edition of the Śivasamhitā (2009). The verse is absent in another passage on mahābandha that the author of the Yogacintāmaṇi cites and attributes to the Haṭhapradīpikā.

❖ Commentary

The reading ūrdhvaṃgativibodhakaḥ (‘initiates an upward flow’) is found in the source (Amaraugha 25) and all Haṭhapradīpikā witnesses except the Jyotsnā (where the line is found earlier). While the Amaraughaprabodha has the reading ūrdhvaṃgativisodhanaḥ (‘purification of the upward flow’), the Amṛtasiddhi (12.14) states that the chin-lock prevents the upward flow (ūrdhvaṃgatinirodhakaḥ) in all the channels. The Amaraugha is referring to the idea (likely accepted by Svātmārāma) that the root lock creates an upward flow in all the channels that prevents the elements and essences of the body from escaping (cf. Amṛtasiddhi 12.8–10).

Trivenī and Kedāra are pilgrimage sites, the former at Prayāga where the Gaṅgā, Yamunā and subtle Sarasvatī meet, the latter in the Himālaya, near the source of the Gaṅgā. The bodily trivenī is located in the navel or heart by earlier Śaiva works (BIRCH 2019: 967). Here it may be the same as the trikūṭa and located between the eyebrows (MALLINSON 2007: 209 n. 259). Brahmānanda, who does not identify a location for Trivenī, understands Kedāra to be between the eyebrows. In the Khecarīvidyā it is located on the back of the head above the nape of the neck (MALLINSON 2007: 214 n. 285). For other references on the location of Kedāra, see BIRCH 2019: 967 n. 57.

We are not certain of the meaning here of nibhṛtam, which is found in all of the collated witnesses and important testimonia. We have understood it as an adverb with the meaning ‘firmly’ rather than the more usual but here inappropriate ‘secretly’. In the Ĵyotsnā (3.26), Brahmananda glosses it as niścalam (‘immovably’).

❖ Commentary

The α, γ and other groups have saṁbandhāj, which is possible but somewhat awkward (i.e. ‘because of the union of the moon, sun and fire, the state of a dead person, which has arisen, leads to immortality’). The adopted reading saṁbandho, which is supported by ζ<sub>2</sub>, Yuktabhavadēva 7.200 and Jyotsnā 3.28, makes better sense but its meaning is not as clear as the formulation in the source text (i.e. Amaraughā 30: °saṁbandhaṁ jāniyād amṛtāya).

The compound mṛtāvasthā (‘the dead state’) refers both to a dead person (in the sense that the yogi appears as if dead) and the dead state of the breath when the moon, sun and fire have united. For the alchemical metaphor of mṛtāvasthā (cf. marāṇāvasthā), see the commentary on 3.12.

In the version found in Jyotsnā 3.28 and ζ<sub>3</sub>, η<sub>1</sub>, η<sub>2</sub> and the Yuktabhavadēva, the final verse quarter has been rewritten to say that the yogi then exhales the breath (tato vāyūṁ virecayet). This implies that mṛtāvasthā is a breath retention (kumbhaka), which is apparent in Brahmananda’s explanation:

मृतस्य प्राणवियुक्तस्यावस्था मृतावस्था समुत्पन्ना भवति, इडापिङ्गलयोः प्राणसञ्चाराभावात् । ततस्तदनन्तरं वायुं विरेचयेन्नासिकापुटभ्यां शनैस्त्वजेत् ।

The state of death that has arisen is the state of one who has died, [that is,] of one who is devoid of the breath because of the absence of movement of prāṇa in the idā

❖ Commentary

In the third verse quarter, the reading vedhaghnaḥ (‘cures wounds’?) found in α and the other groups, with the exception of δ (vegaghnaḥ), is odd as it does not seem related to the other two symptoms of old age (i.e. wrinkles and grey hair) that this mudrā can cure. Adopting Brahmananda’s otherwise unattested reading, we have understood vedhaghnaḥ to be a mistake for vepaghnaḥ, ‘cures trembling’, which occurs in some manuscripts in the δ<sub>ω</sub> (J<sub>1</sub>, J<sub>3</sub>, N<sub>16</sub>, N<sub>18</sub>) and π (N<sub>12</sub> contaminated) and ζ (J<sub>14</sub> contaminated) groups, as well as the Yogacintāmaṇi, Yuktabhavadēva, and Jyotsnā. The mistake likely arose from the similarity of dha and pa in Nagari scripts.

❖ Commentary

Various versions of this verse have been transmitted in upagīti ( $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ ), gīti ( $\epsilon$ ), āryā ( $\eta_2$ ) and anuṣṭubh ( $\pi_\omega$ ) metres. We have adopted a version close to  $\alpha_2$ , which has a slight metrical fault:

छेदनचालनं दोहैः कला क्रमेण प्रवर्धयेत्तावत् ।

सा यावद् भ्रूमध्यं विसति तदानीं खेचरीसिद्धिः ॥

The emendation of tadānīm to tadā renders the verse an āryā. The word krameṇa is well attested by manuscripts of the  $\alpha$ ,  $\zeta$ ,  $\eta$  and  $\pi$  groups, which all have unmetrical or corrupted versions.

कपालकुहरे जिह्वा प्रविष्टा विपरीतगा ।
भ्रुवोरन्तर्गता दृष्टिर्मुद्रा भवति खेचरी ॥ ३३ ॥

When the tongue is turned back and inserted into the cavity of the skull and the gaze is between the brows, the sky-roving seal arises.
(33)

It is possible that this verse was originally composed in the upagīti metre, as three other verses in the Haṭhapradīpikā (i.e. 1.60, 4.51 and 4.55), likely composed by the author, are in this metre. If this were the case, the verse may have read kramād vardhayet, which would scan correctly as upagīti. However, this reading is not attested by the manuscripts or testimonia that we have consulted.

The meaning of kalā as ‘tongue’ is not attested in any Sanskrit dictionary but kalā occurs in the sense of the tongue in a subsequent verse of this chapter (cf. 3.34a) and it is glossed by Brahmānanda with jihvā in Jyotsnā 3.33 and 3.37.

Although 3.34 is absent in  $\alpha_1$ , it is in  $\alpha_2$  and  $\alpha_3$ , and also the  $\gamma$  and  $\eta$  groups. Other manuscripts have an additional line that gives vyomacakra as an alternative name for khecarīmudrā (3.34\*1). On the meaning of vyomacakra, see the commentary on X4.49.

❖ Commentary

The third quarter of this verse has been subjected to much rewriting. Most of the collated manuscripts, including  $\alpha_2$  ( $\alpha_1$  is illegible here and  $\alpha_3$  is missing this verse quarter), have the reading haṭhāt śaktyā. This reading only makes sense if one infers that śaktyā is referring to khecarīmudrā, so that the second line means 'blocked by yonimudrā, semen goes up forcefully by the power [of khecarīmudrā].’ The reading hi tacchaktyā of  $\delta_2$  (and the Yogacintāmaṇi), appears to be an attempt to render more clearly the meaning ‘by the power of khecarī.’ Such an interpretation suggests that yonimudrā blocks bindu’s downward course and khecarī causes it to go upwards forcefully.

The oldest manuscript of the Vivekamārtaṇḍa (ms. no. 4110) has hataḥ śaktyā, which is attested by three Haṭhapradīpikā manuscripts on lower branches of the stemma (i.e. B<sub>a</sub>, C<sub>2</sub> and P<sub>4</sub>). The participle hataḥ makes sense of the instrumental śaktyā, rendering the meaning ‘struck by Kuṇḍalinī.’

Alternatively, the word hataḥ (as well as the other variants kṛtaḥ, kṛte, and even haṭhāt) may derive from hṛtaḥ, which is attested by manuscripts of the Jyotsnā. The reading hṛtaḥ śaktyā renders the verse as saying that semen goes up, carried by Kuṇḍalinī.

In Jyotsnā 3.43, Brahmānanda explains yonimudrā as essentially the contraction of the penis (yonimudrayā medhrākuñcanarūpayā). He may have had in mind the practice of contracting and drawing the urethra upwards, which is described below in the section on vajrolimudrā (Haṭhapradīpikā 3.82). The author of the Yogaprakāśikā (5.66) states that yonimudrā is well known in treatises on mantra (yonimudrayeti mantraśāstraprasiddhayety arthaḥ/ prasidhyayety ed.). This is consistent with the Śivasamhitā’s discussion of yonimudrā (4.2, 5.12), where it is described as activating the perineum (yoni) by contracting it in order to bring about success in mantra repetition. Later compendiums on yoga reiterate the role of yonimudrā in mantra practice (e.g., the Yogacintāmaṇi f. 65r, citing the Pārameśvaratantra, and Haṭhatattvakaumudī 33.12). The Haṭhayogasamhitā (43–48) teaches a different version of yonimudrā in its repertoire of twenty-five mudrās. In this work, yonimudrā is supposed to awaken Kuṇḍalinī and involves sitting in siddhāsana, blocking the ears, eyes, nose and mouth with the thumbs, index, middle and ring fingers respectively, uniting prāṇa and apāna, meditating on the six cakras, and repeating the mantra hum hamsa.

❖ Commentary

Manuscripts of the main groups, including  $\alpha$ ,  $\gamma$  and  $\epsilon$ , contain an additional line after 3.39 that is largely incoherent, aside from indicating that the tongue is in the cavity of the skull and that there is a mudrā for uniting the kalās (kapālahukhare jihvā kalāsandhānamudrayā). This line likely derives from a marginal note, the first half of which was probably explaining ūrdhvajihvaḥ in the next verse. The compound kalāsamdhānamudrayā may have been added as some form of dittography or as a gloss on yonimudrā, which is not described elsewhere in the text. In a slightly modified form, this line appears in a verse in the six-chapter version of the Haṭhapradīpikā (f. 112r–112v):

कपालकुहरे जिह्वा कलासन्धानवर्जिता ।

With his face turned upwards and his tongue fixed in the aperture [of the skull], [the yogi] should visualise as the supreme śakti [the nectar] that is forcibly obtained from the breath having dripped from the head into the sixteen petals of the lotus. And the yogi who drinks the gushing nectar, the pure fluid [surging] from the [moon's] digits in waves, is free of disease, has a body as soft as lotus fibre, and lives a long time. (46)

❖ Commentary

The meaning of prāṇāt ('from the breath') in the first verse quarter is not easy to understand without the context of this verse in the source text, the Vivekamārtaṇḍa. In the verse preceding this one in the Vivekamārtaṇḍa (117), the breath, on reaching the "great lotus", is said to turn into nectar (amṛta). In Jyotsnā 3.51, Brahmananda notes that there is a variant prāṇaiḥ ('by means of the breaths'), which is easier to understand than prāṇāt. He nonetheless accepts prāṇāt and understands it as being the means by which the nectar is obtained (prāṇāt sādhanabhūtād avāptam). He also understands the sixteen-petalled lotus to be the lotus in the throat, into which the nectar drips.

If the tongue, while oozing nectar and constantly kissing the tip of the uvula, is salty, pungent, like milk or the same as honey and ghee, diseases are eliminated for [the yogi], he stops ageing, can recite treatises and scriptures, attains immortality together with the eight-fold powers, and attracts Siddha women. #### ❖ Commentary

The instruction to ‘contract the wind’ (vāyum ākuñcayet) is odd (especially with samīraṇaḥ in the fourth pāda) and not found in other texts. Mallinson has adopted yonim for vāyum (cf. Haṭhapradīpikā 3.49b) in his edition of this verse in its source text, the Dattātreyayogaśāstra, which is not found in the manuscripts of that text but is in the Haṭhapradīpikā’s δ manuscripts. Another possibility is that vāyum is a corruption of pāyum, ‘anus’.

In the context of the root lock, vāyum ākuñcayet can be understood as an instruction to contract apānavāyu, which is mentioned in the previous verse (3.50a). Instructions to contract apānavāyu are found in other yoga texts, such as Yogatārāvalī 7b (ākuñcanaiḥ śaśvad apānavāyoh), Śivasamhitā 4.84cd (apānavāyum ākuñcya balād...), Śivayogapradīpikā 2.53ab (athordhvamadyasthirabandhanābhyām ākuñcanād ūrdhvam apānavāyoh) and Yuktabhavadēva 7.297 (ādharakamale suptām cālayet kuṇḍalīm drḍhām/ apānavāyum ākrṣya balād ākuñcya buddhimān). In Jyotsnā 3.63, Brahmananda understands vāyu in this verse as apāna when he says that ‘one should contract the wind, apāna’ (vāyum apānam ākuñcayed), which he explains as, ‘one should pull it by contractions of the anus’ (gudasyākuñcanenākaraṣayet). In the same vein, Bhavadevamīśra glosses ‘pulling apāna’ (apānākaraṣaṇam) as ‘contracting the anus’ (gudākuñcanam), when commenting on ‘having pulled apānavāyu and forcefully contracted it ...’ (apānavāyum ākrṣya balād ākuñcya...) in Yuktabhavadēva 297 and 301.

❖ Commentary

Since the term nāda usually means ‘internal sound’ in Haṭha and Rājayoga texts, it is possible that bindu here was understood by some to have the tantric connotations of sonic and visual foci (MALLINSON 2007: 219 n. 325) or two levels of sonic emanation in mantroccāra, where nāda is an unvoiced sound and bindu is the slightly coarser sound of inner murmuring (see Tāntrikā-bhidhānakośa vol. 3: 278–279). However, there is a passage in the Amaraughā (10–12) where nāda and bindu are paired and it is clear that bindu means generative fluid.

❖ Commentary

The second verse quarter has been rewritten in  $\alpha_1$  and  $\alpha_2$  as prāṇamūlasvarūpakam, which is similar to  $\eta_1$  (prāṇamūlasvarūpakau) and the Haṭharatnāvalī (mūlarūpasvarūpakau). It is likely that mūla arose as a misreading of uṣṇa. References to prāṇa being hot by nature (and apāna being cold) occur in other works, such as the Mokṣopāya (6.85.111–112) and Haṭhatattvakaumudī (4.14, 41.2). The commentators Bālakṛṣṇa (Yogaparakāśikā 5.85) and Brahmānanda (Jyotsnā 3.67) accept the idea that prāṇa is hot by nature.

❖ Commentary

In the Vivekamārtaṇḍa this verse is preceded by a passage on mūlabandha, so the likely meaning of the fourth verse quarter is that (mūla)bandha is to be performed in this practice. The δ group of the Haṭhapradīpikā witnesses has ‘the root [lock] is applied’ (mūlaṃ vidhīyate), which appears to be an attempt to clarify the meaning of the original verse.

The word uḍyāṇaṃ in the first pāda is attested in manuscripts of the Vivekamārtaṇḍa, the source of this verse, and two manuscripts of the α group. This spelling is attested in several vernacular works (e.g., Aṣṭāṅgayoga of Caranadāsa 144, 275, 307–8, Jogapradīpyaka 588, 635, 686 etc.), as well as other Sanskrit yoga texts (e.g., Yogatārāvalī 6, Dhyānabindūpaniṣat 75 etc.). Other witnesses, including the Jyotsnā, have uḍḍīṇaṃ, the usual form for the verbal noun from uḍ-ḍī.

❖ Commentary

We have understood the first line to mean that even though the basics of the practice of uddīyāṇa are easy, it still needs to be taught by the guru. Witnesses of the γ and δ groups read yathā for sadā, perhaps as a deliberate substitution of the more difficult sadā, making the verse mean that uddīyāṇa is easy in the way that is taught by the guru.

❖ Commentary

In the Haṭhapradīpikā this verse seems to instruct the yogi to press the bulb (kanda) with the feet while holding them with the hands. The adopted reading of the source text, the Gorakṣaśataka, which is only found in witness T (and there in the singular jānu, which has been emended to the dual jānū in Mallinson's edition) says that it is the knees that are to be held, which would still allow for the feet to press the bulb. In the Yuktabhavadeva (7.224), Bhavadevamiśra says that the bulb is near the navel and the legs are held near the ankles, suggesting that the bulb is pressed by using the hands to pull the feet into the lower abdomen.

Yuktabhavadeva 7.224 (commenting on uḍḍiyāṇabandha)

Holding the ankles with the hands and pressing the kanda with the feet is also the view of Brahmanānda (Jyotsnā 3.114), who follows the Yogayājñavalkya (4.14, 4.16) in thinking that the place of the kanda is nine fingerbreadths above the middle of the body, which is two fingerbreadths above the anus (Jyotsnā 3.113).

In the Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā (f. 36r), Sundaradeva explains that the yogi presses the kanda in the navel by performing uḍḍiyāṇabandha, along with the root and chin locks, at the end of kumbhaka and the beginning of exhalation. It is thus the backward stretch in the abdomen (udare paścimatāna) that presses the kanda in the navel.

❖ Commentary

In 3.64b, the reading gale (‘in the throat’) is very well attested by manuscripts of the source text, the Gorakṣaśataka, and the Hathapradīpikā (including all three α witnesses). Its meaning is not entirely clear to us as the ‘backward stretch’ (paścimaṃ tānam) usually occurs above and below the navel when the uḍḍiyāna lock is applied, as stated above in verse 3.60. We have not seen the neck mentioned in this regard in any other premodern work, and the absence of ca suggests that gale may be a corruption. The alternative reading cibukaṃ hr̥di in manuscripts of the Hathapradīpikā on lower branches of the stemma and in the testimonia is a reference to

Drawing on x-ray experiments on uḍḍiyāṇa-bandha conducted at the Kaivalyadhama Yoga Institute, the article mentions a sub-atmospheric (negative) pressure in visceral cavities, such as the oesophagus and stomach, as a physiological effect of applying uḍḍiyāṇa.

❖ Commentary

The reading sthāpayed ḍṛḍham icchayā in the second verse quarter is attested by the manuscripts of the  $\alpha$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\eta$  and  $\pi$  groups. It is also well-attested in the transmission of the source text, the Dattātreyayogaśāstra, but in his edition Mallinson has adopted sthāpayed cibukaṃ ḍṛḍham on semantic grounds. This reading is found in two of his favoured manuscripts but this is one of the very few instances where he reads against his stemmatic hypothesis. He puts this down to contamination in the transmission. Our sources, in particular the manuscripts of the  $\alpha$  group, indicate that Svātmārāma read sthāpayed ḍṛḍham icchayā (which is also the reading which Mallinson's stemmatic hypothesis indicates is primary in the Dattātreyayogaśāstra) and we have adopted it accordingly. It is certainly the lectio difficilior. Taking kaṇṭham as the object of sthāpayet is awkward, as it is hard to see how one could place the throat on the chest, and the meaning of icchayā, which we have translated as “deliberately”, is uncertain.

❖ Commentary

The import of the second line of this verse is not entirely clear without the context of the source text. It derives from a passage in the Jñānasāra (2.1–5), which identifies khecarīmudrā as the ‘cakra of the void’ (vyomacakra) and khecarīmudrā combined with the contraction of the throat as the ‘middle cakra’ (madhyacakra). The middle cakra seems to be so designated because it is situated between the vyomacakra and a root cakra (mūlacakra), which is located between two śaktis in the navel.

Svātmārāma appears to have incorporated the Jñānasāra’s verse on khecarī and the madhyacakra into his discussion of the jālandhara lock because its reference to contracting the throat (kaṇṭhasaṃkocana) reinforces the idea that this contraction blocks important channels, a point stated more generally in the two preceding verses that he borrowed from the Vivekamārtaṇḍa. The Jñānasāra’s verse on vyomacakra was incorporated into later versions of the Haṭhapradīpikā (see the commentary on X4.49).

In Jyotsnā 3.73, Brahmananda, who appears to have been unaware of the Jñānasāra, says that the middle cakra (madhyacakra) is viśuddha cakra. He appears to say this because the viśuddha cakra is located in the throat and the jālandhara lock is a contraction of the throat. However, he also connects the viśuddha cakra to the sixteen supports (ṣoḍaśādhāra) at the end of

❖ Commentary

As far as we know, the compound pavanālaya does not occur in other yoga texts. Here, it appears to refer to Suṣumnā. The similar compound prāṇālaya is mentioned in other yoga texts, such as the Yogayājñavalkya (4.52–53), but it refers to the locations in the body where prāṇa resides, as opposed to the other bodily winds.

❖ Commentary

We have adopted the reading ṣaṇmāsordhvaṃ in the second verse quarter. It is attested by manuscripts of the Dattātreyayogaśāstra (the source text) and the Jyotsnā (3.82). It makes good sense and explains the rather odd readings in  $\alpha$  and other manuscripts, ṣaṇmāsārdhān, ṣaṇmāsārdhaṃ and ṣaṇmāsārdhe. The  $\gamma$  and  $\delta$  groups have a different verb as well, ṣaṇmāsārdhena naśyati.

See 4.10–11, where these verses are also found.

The  $\alpha$  group do not have 3.77\*1 and 3.77\*2 in the third chapter (but rather in the fourth) and other manuscripts omit them as well (notably the  $\eta$  group). For a discussion of these verses, see the introduction p. 77.

On the possible referents of kṣīra, see MALLINSON 2024 on Dattātreyayogaśāstra 154. According to Brahmānanda (Jyotsnā 3.84), the compound vaśavartinī, which we have translated as ‘an obedient woman,’ could be a wife (vaśavartinī svādhīnā nārī vanitā). In 3.82, the reading bhāryābhage in  $\eta_1$ ,  $\eta_2$  and  $\pi_\omega$  supports Brahmānanda’s view that the woman is the yogi’s wife.

मेहनेन शनैः सम्यगूर्ध्वकुञ्चनमभ्यसेत् ।

❖ Commentary

In the Haṭhatattvakaumudī, Sundaradeva states that this upward contraction of the urethra, which is the method by which fluids are drawn up it, is done in the region of apānavāyu and the anus. Brahmānanda states that this practice is done immediately after sex.

❖ Commentary

The omission of 3.84ab in the  $\eta$  group and  $\delta_3$  is likely to be the result of haplography (bindu-dhāraṇāt is repeated).

The readings mṛtyubhayaṃ ( $\alpha_3$ ,  $\delta$ ,  $\varepsilon$ ,  $\eta$ ,  $\pi$ ) and kālabhayaṃ ( $\alpha_2$ ,  $\gamma$ ) are well attested by the main manuscript groups, but mṛtyubhayaṃ is in the important witnesses of the source text, the Vivekamārtaṇḍa.

Both  $\alpha_2$  and  $\alpha_3$  indicate that manas instead of citta was the reading of the initial compound. Therefore, we have conjectured manāyattam, assuming double sandhi from manas-āyattam.

These two pādas appear to stand apart and function as a heading introducing the practices of sahajolī and amarolī, which are described in the verses that follow. Some manuscript groups other than  $\alpha$  and  $\pi$  insert separate headings for sahajolī and amarolī. However, since 3.87 introduces these practices, these additional headings are redundant and unlikely to be original.

❖ Commentary

Some manuscripts, including  $\alpha_2$  and  $\alpha_3$  (missing in  $\alpha_1$ ), omit 3.88ab. We have included it because in the Dattātreyayogaśāstra, the source of this verse, 3.88ab specifies the substance mentioned in 3.88cd that the man and woman are supposed to rub into their bodies after sexual intercourse.

In the Dattātreyayogaśāstra's teaching on sahajolī (163 and 181–183) a rag is used to wipe up the residue of a mixture of semen and sweat that has been rubbed into the body, and then soaked in a paste of water and ash before being rubbed over the body.

The awkward plural jaleṣu in 3.88a was probably the result of Svātmārāma removing the pronoun from the compound tajjale in the Dattātreyayogaśāstra's verse because it has no referent in the Haṭhāpradīpikā's compilation.

❖ Commentary

In the first verse quarter, the gerund samākṛṣya ( $\gamma$ ) has been adopted, instead of the better-attested samākuñcya, as it yields a more appropriate sense and is used similarly to ākṛṣya in 3.82.

Verses 3.91\*1–3 have been greyscaled because they are absent in  $\alpha_3$  (and missing in  $\alpha_1$ ). They appear to have been borrowed from the Dattātreyayogaśāstra's section on vajrolī, perhaps with the intention of supplementing 3.92–93 by providing additional details on how a woman practises vajrolī. The verses are present in  $\alpha_2$  after verse 3.86ab where the verse quarter vajrolyā saha yoginī occurs twice (also at 3.92b), which suggests that the version of vajrolī in  $\alpha_2$  has been subject to further revision. The fact that 3.91\*1–3 are in all groups except  $\alpha$  indicates that they were added early in the transmission of the Haṭhapradīpikā.

❖ Commentary

The  $\alpha_3$  manuscript has a significantly shorter and more coherent version of śakticālanā. It omits six introductory verses, of which three are from the Vivekamārtaṇḍa or one of its longer recensions and three have no known source, including one that contains a list of synonyms for kuṇḍalinī. This section is missing in  $\alpha_1$  (3.83–3.96) and  $\alpha_2$  adds these verses (except 3.93\*6) after 3.96, which suggests that they have been inserted from elsewhere. Generally speaking, it appears that some redactors have taken the section on śakticālanā in the Haṭhāpradīpikā as an opportunity to add material on kuṇḍalinī, in particular her location, shape, and soteriological importance.

❖ Commentary

The referent of bālaraṇḍā tapasvinī here is unclear. In some manuscripts this verse is followed by one (3.94*1) in which bālaraṇḍā is identified as sarasvatī, which in the context of śakticālana could refer to the tongue. She could also be Kuṇḍalinī, who in 3.93*5 is located at the navel, which is said to be the location of Viṣṇu (e.g. Dhyānabindūpaniṣat 28–30). In his commentary on this verse in the Bodhasāra (1906: 137), Divākara says that the seizing of Kuṇḍalinī itself is the highest state of Viṣṇu (... bālaraṇḍām ... grhṇīyād vaśikuryāt tat tasyā vaśikaraṇam eva viṣṇor vyāpanalakṣaṇasya paramātmanah paramaṃ kevalaṃ ... padaṃ svarūpaṃ jñeyam).

❖ Commentary

Verses 3.95\*1–2 are absent in  $\alpha_2$  and  $\alpha_3$ . They introduce the idea of awakening kuṇḍalinī by moving the tongue with a cloth, which is a practice called sarasvatīcālana in the Gorakṣaśataka (16–25). These verses do not have a known source and are somewhat obscure unless one is aware of the more coherent explanation of this practice in the Gorakṣaśataka. In his Haṭhasaṅketa-candrikā (see testimonia), Sundaradeva makes sense of this verse by equating the tongue with Kuṇḍalinī. This enables him to understand the reference to the cloth (paridhāna) as the technique of wrapping the tongue in a cloth and milking it (i.e. sarasvatīcālana in the Gorakṣaśataka). This interpretation also makes sense of the next verse (3.95\*2), which describes the cloth.

[3.95*2]

❖ Commentary

This verse was likely added to explain ‘by the method of the cloth’ (paridhānayuktyā) in the previous verse. For information on sources and testimonia, see 3.32*5.

❖ Commentary

Bhastrī or bhastrikā kumbhaka is taught at 2.60–68. The reference to vajrāsana may be pointing to the practice of uḍḍiyāṇa, which was described earlier in the chapter and is supposed to awaken Kuṇḍalinī. The contraction of the sun mentioned in the next verse supports this.

❖ Commentary

In Jyotsnā 3.116, Brahmānanda understands bhānor ākuñcanaṃ as a contraction of the navel. In contrast, Sundaradeva, in his Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā (see testimonia), interprets it as drawing prāṇa through the sun channel (sūryanāḍyākaraṣaṇa), thereby intensifying the bodily fire.

❖ Commentary

Verse 3.97\*1 is absent in the  $\alpha$  group. It is very close to a verse in the Amaraughasāsana, which is likely to be its source, although the date of the Amaraughasāsana is yet to be firmly established. This verse's import of rejuvenating the body by flooding it with nectar is not directly connected with those proceeding it. Its meaning is not clear in the published edition of the Amaraughasāsana and we are not confident of the readings adopted in our edition nor the meaning of the verse.

❖ Commentary

Verses 3.97\*2–3 are absent in the  $\alpha$  group and have no known source. They elaborate further on the instruction to practise bhastrī kumbhaka in 3.96. The practice of other kumbhakas for moving Kuṇḍalinī is mentioned in 3.97\*3.

The reading abhyāsato in 3.97\*2c, which is attested by manuscripts of the  $\gamma$  group and the testimonia, is possible but seems to be a corruption of the participle, abhyasato.

❖ Commentary

As noted in the introduction (p. 28), Svātmārāma appears not to have understood the practice of śakticālana in the same way as his primary source text for its description, the Gorakṣaśataka, in which a cloth is wrapped around the tongue so that it can be repeatedly pulled, thereby lifting up the base of the central channel. He does not include the Gorakṣaśataka verses which mention the tongue or the cloth (but some later recensions of the Haṭhapradīpikā do introduce them). Verses 98 and 99 suggest that he understood the practice to involve repeated contraction of the region of the sun at the lower end of the central channel. The result is the same, namely that Kuṇḍalinī is awakened and uncoils herself, thereby allowing Prāṇa to enter the central channel.

जहाति तस्मात्प्राणोऽयं सुषुम्णां व्रजति स्वतः ॥ ९९ ॥

Extracted from Suṣuṃṇā by this [practice], Kuṇḍalinī leaves it. As a result of this, prāṇa automatically enters Suṣuṃṇā. (99)

❖ Commentary

In the Gorakṣaśataka (26cd–27ab), the source text, this verse occurs in a passage on sarasvatī-cālana, which is the practice of moving the tongue (i.e. sarasvatī) by wrapping a cloth around it and tugging it in order to raise the lower end of the Suṣumṇā. In the Gorakṣaśataka, Sarasvatī is said to be another name for Arundhatī and, since the tongue is instrumental for speech and sarasvatī is the name of a Goddess identified with speech (vāc), the Gorakṣaśataka's reading of śabdagarbhām sarasvatīm makes good sense. However, it seems that Svātmārāma has changed 3.100b to read śabdagarbhām arundhatim and has understood arundhatī as Kuṇḍalinī. This is affirmed in longer versions of the Haṭhapradīpikā (3.93*2) that contain a verse on synonyms of Kuṇḍalinī, which include Arundhatī. We are yet to find Arundhatī equated with Kuṇḍalinī in a text composed before the Haṭhapradīpikā but this identification is found in subsequent compendiums and commentaries (e.g. Yogacintāmaṇi f. 78v, Yuktabhavadēva 7.300, Jyotsnā 104, 119, Yogaprakāśikā 5.166).

❖ Commentary

In the witnesses of the earliest reconstructable recensions of the Haṭhapradīpikā, including the  $\alpha$  manuscripts, this verse occurs in the section on śakticālana. This is also the case in the Yogalakṣaṇāvalī, Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā and the longer recensions of the Haṭhapradīpikā with six and ten chapters. However, in the context of śakticālana, the referent of cāndrī is unclear. It

In his Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā (see the testimonia), Sundaradeva defines it as a flow of perspiration (gharmadhārā) that arises from exertion in the practice and is emitted from the moon in forehead (lalāṭacandra). In the Yogaparakāśikā, Bālakṛṣṇa glosses it simply as nectar (sudhā) (5.182). In the Haṭhayogasaṃhitā (p. 41) and Jyot-snā (3.98), this verse is in the section on amarolī, which provides a clear referent of cāndrī as the cool middle flow of urine (see 3.96 [3.90 in our edition]).

❖ Commentary

This verse is omitted by the  $\alpha$  group. Its claim is not entirely consistent with the role of the ṣaṭkarma, which are cleansing techniques that do not require Kuṇḍalinī. It was likely added to the original text as a further laudatory statement on the practice of Kuṇḍalinī.

Manuscripts of the  $\varepsilon$ ,  $\zeta$ ,  $\eta$ , and  $\pi$  groups have a different reading for the second line; ‘each mudrā is capable of bringing about all powers’ (karāṇe sarvasiddhīnām ekaikāpi kṣamaiva sā).

❖ Commentary

The Yogaprakāśikā (5.186) interprets the similes in this verse as we have translated them, ‘Just as without a king [and] moon, the earth and night do not shine...’ (yathā mahīpālaṃ candramasam vinā prthvīniśe na rājete...). However, in Jyotsnā 3.126, Brahmananda interprets the earth (prthvī) as āsana because both are connected by the quality of steadiness (sthairyaguna-yogāt), and the night (niśā) as breath retention (kumbhaka) because both are characterised by the absence of movement of people and wind (prāṇasañcārābhāvalakṣaṇaḥ). Brahmananda’s interpretation seems somewhat far-fetched. The last line could also be understood in a non-

[The yogi] should carry out all breath practice with his mind engaged. The wise man must not let his attention wander. (105)

❖ Commentary

The reading of khilāpi in the first verse quarter is unusual but well attested by the witnesses including the  $\alpha$  group of manuscripts. In the Abhidhānacintāmaṇi (940), khila is defined as something uncultivated such as field (kṣetrādyaprahataṃ khilam) or, as the Amarapadavivṛti (2.1.5) puts it, ‘not marked by a plough’ (lāṅgalena na likhitam iti khilam). In the context of Haṭhpradīpikā 3.106, qualifying suṣumṇā with khila implies that the central channel has yet to be cultivated (i.e. traversed).
