❖ Commentary

The term snuhī can refer to several species of Euphorbia, which is generally known as spurge. Two common species are Euphorbia antiquorum Linn. ('triangular' or 'oleander' spurge) or nerifolia Linn. The latter was probably not used in the practice of khēcārīmudrā as NADKARNI (1926: 349) describes it as a 'leafless shrub.' Although all varieties of Euphorbia are poisonous, the sap, roots and bark have been used in medicines since the time of Caraka and Suśruta (SINGH AND CHUNEKAR 1999: 459).
