❖ Commentary

Many manuscripts of the ε , γ , ζ and π groups, as well as the ḥyotsnā (2.1), have the plural prāṇāyāmān in 2.1d. The plural is possible here as it could refer to multiple repetitions of the basic alternate nostril breath control technique taught at 2.7–11, or to the different techniques of retention (kumbhaka) taught later in the chapter. The variation between singular and plural recurs through this chapter, and we have followed the α_1 readings, which make good sense. In this case, since the verse is introducing the topic of breath control, the more general sense of the singular is appropriate.

❖ Commentary

In the second verse quarter we have adopted the reading dr̥ḍhabandhanam found in most of the α , γ and π manuscripts over that found in the source text, niṣcalaṃ tathā, which is also found in some δ , η and π manuscripts and testimonia. We thus understand it to be the result of a deliberate change by Svātmārāma.

As noted by Brahmānanda, in addition to its primary meaning of immobility, sthāṇutvam can also mean the state of being Śiva, for whom Sthāṇu is another name.

❖ Commentary

The meaning of avirodhataḥ ('without harm/discomfort') makes better sense in this context than anirodhataḥ ('without cessation'). One might try to construe anirodhataḥ as 'without stopping the breath,' but verse 2.7 clearly states that the breath should be held as long as possible (yathāśakti). According to the apparatus of the critical edition of the Haṭharatnāvalī, avirodhataḥ is well-attested for the parallel line. In addition, avirodhataḥ is found (and also virodhahīnam) in a passage of the Haṭhatattvakaumudī (36.6–9) that appears to have been loosely based on Haṭhapradīpikā 2.7–9.

❖ Commentary

This verse is summarizing the following passage in the Dattātreyayogaśāstra (63cd–65ab):

एवं प्रातः समासीनः कुर्याद्विंशति कुम्भकान् ॥ ६३ ॥
एवं मध्याह्नसमये कुर्याद्विंशति कुम्भकान् ।
एवं सायं प्रकुर्वीत पुनर्विंशति कुम्भकान् ॥ ६४ ॥
एवमेवार्धरात्रेऽपि कुर्याद्विंशति कुम्भकान् ।

Without reference to the Dattātreyayogaśāstra, the meaning of the second half of the verse is ambiguous because it could be understood as saying that the yogi should practise up to eighty retentions four times a day. In his Jyotsnā (2.11), Brahmananda understands it this way, and takes śanaiḥ to mean ‘gradually’ building up to the eighty retentions. In the parallel verses in the Dattātreyayogaśāstra, however, it is clear that twenty retentions are to be practised four times a day.

❖ Commentary

The manuscript readings diverge greatly in the second line. In the third verse quarter, all of the manuscripts have prāṇa in some form (instead of deha as found in the source text, the Vivekamārtaṇḍa). The α manuscript, along with some of the ε , ζ , η and π manuscripts, seems to state that it is padmāsana that rises up again and again in the highest stage of holding the breath (uttiṣṭhaty uttame prāṇarodhe padmāsanaḥ muhuḥ). We have adopted a similar reading but with padmāsane (δ_1 and π_2) because it makes better sense that the yogi rises up while seated in lotus pose. Another version is seen in η_2 , which appears to say that the breaths rise up again and again when one is seated in the lotus pose (uttiṣṭhanty uttame prāṇā baddhe padmāsane muhuḥ). However, the verse is about the external signs that might arise in prāṇāyāma rather than internal processes. Such confusion has arisen because the verse was taken from the Vivekamārtaṇḍa without its context, which is a classification of different levels of prāṇāyāma, so Svātmārāma needed to include prāṇarodhe meaning prāṇāyāma in order for the different adjectives to have something with which to agree, and he did so despite the infelicity of prāṇarodhe crossing the pāda break.

The idea that alternate nostril breathing is done to purify the channels can be found in early Śaiva tantras; see e.g. the Nayasūtra of the Niśvāsātattvasaṃhitā (4.110) and the Svacchanda-tantra (7.294cd–7.295ab). The latter verse is as follows:

❖ Commentary

The reading ukhālam which we have adopted in the fourth pāda is a vernacular term for vomiting which is found in the α recension but has been changed in some witnesses to more Sanskritic forms, such as udgāram and prakṣālyam.

Many manuscripts, including several of those collated (i.e. η_2 , π_2 and π_ω), and the ṣyotsnā (2.24), add two verse quarters stating that the length of the cloth is fifteen cubits (hastapañcadaśena tu) and that the practice should be performed according to the guru's teachings (gurūpadiṣṭamārgena). These additions are absent from the α , γ and ζ groups. Moreover, the compound hastapañcadaśena does not fit the syntax of the sentence, while the pāda referring to the guru's teaching is a cliché that was probably inserted as a verse filler when with the pāda on the length of the cloth was added.

❖ Commentary

The reading pakhālaṃ that we have adopted in the fourth pāda is found in α_2 and π_ω and is close to the reading of α_1 . It reflects vernacular usage as found in the old Hindi Aṣṭāṅgayoga of Caranadāsa (6.71ab). Some other witnesses have the Sanskritised form prakṣālaṃ, which is very rare in Sanskrit sources, while others have the more common kṣālaṇaṃ.

❖ Commentary

We have assumed that the compound gulmaplihodara is referring generally to swelling (gulma), spleen disorders (plihan) and stomach diseases (udara), but the terms gulma and plihodara can refer to more specific diseases. In Suśrutasamhitā, uttaratantra 42.4, gulma is defined as a movable or immovable round lump (granthi) that might arise between the heart and lower abdomen (basti) and can grow or shrink:

हृद्वस्त्योरन्तरे ग्रन्थिः संचारी यदि वाऽचलः ।

चयापचयवान्मृतः स गुल्म इति कीर्तितः ॥

The compound plihodara is the name of a specific disease, which is defined in the Suśrutasamhitā (nidānasthāna 7.14–15) as enlargement of the spleen (plihābhivṛddhi) so gulmaplihodara might be referring more specifically to abdominal lumps and splenomegaly.

❖ Commentary

In this verse and the next the α witnesses read nīti/nītiḥ for the name of this practice. These and related terms are found in various north Indian vernaculars with meanings appropriate for a practice in which a string is pulled back and forth through the nose and mouth. In modern colloquial Bengali, niti can mean the string used to spin a top and is likely to be connected with neta/nētā which means a small piece of cloth. In modern Hindi and Gujarati netī means the cord of a churning stick and is cognate with Sanskrit netra (TURNER 1966: 427, entry 7588). In Old Hindi neta can have the same meaning or be a kind of silk cloth (Callewaert s.v.). In Oriya neta means “a kind of silk cloth worn by girls” (Praharaj s.v.). We thank Lubomír Ondračka for alerting us to several of these references.

The Hindi form of the name for this practice, netī, is very well established nowadays, but Svātmārāma’s original readings in this and the following verse were clearly niti and nīti (vowel length was perhaps not important in the vernacular from which the name was taken). This is confirmed not just by α’s readings at 2.30d but also by 2.31d where only the short first vowel of niti works metrically (some witnesses have rewritten the pāda in order to use the spelling netī). We might thus surmise that, like lauḷī, the practice, or at least its name, was taught to Svātmārāma by Gauḍas, because it is only from Bengal that we have evidence of the use of the form niti.

❖ Commentary

We have adopted the reading caiva in the first verse quarter, which is attested by manuscripts of the γ, δ and π groups and is easy to construe. α₁ and α₂ have vaṭyā and kaṁṭhā respectively, which may derive from kaṁṭhyā (α₃, ε₁, ζ₁), but none of these readings makes sense here. η₁ and η₂ have kāryā, which is unnecessary because of the main verb in the final verse quarter.

Most witnesses, including the ṣyotsnā, read jatrūrdhva in the third verse quarter, which is generally understood as ‘above the collar bones’ or, as Brahmānanda says, the area above the shoulder joints (jatruṇoḥ skandhasandhyor ūrdhvam uparibhāge). On problems concerning the interpretation of jatru, see MEULENBELD 1974: 465. We have adopted jatrūrdhva against the reading of α_1 and α_2 , hanūrdhva, ‘above the jaw’, and α_3 , kaṇṭhordhva, ‘above the throat’.

❖ Commentary

The witnesses have many different readings for the first word of this verse. The α manuscripts are split between modaka (α_1), mocaka (α_2) and movana (α_3). Of these, modaka is the most likely, if it is understood as a medicinal pill. However this meaning is rare, even in medical literature, as modaka is generally used to refer to a small sweet. We have adopted moṭakam, which is attested by δ_2 , ϵ_1 and η_1 , as well as the Yuktabhavadēva, and which we understand to mean “destroyer” (muṭa pramardane, Dhātupāṭha 1.346). BOHTLINGK AND ROTH (s.v.) and MONIER-WILLIAMS (s.v.) give medicinal pill as a possible meaning of moṭaka (cf. modaka) but it appears that this is mainly an inference drawn only from this verse, where the pill is merely a comparison. Several witnesses have sphoṭanam (‘destroying’), which is also possible.

The reading kapāṭakam in the second verse quarter is found in most of the witnesses and testimonia and we have adopted it accordingly. The context indicates that it means “shutter” (in the sense of shutting out something), but we have not found any parallel usages of it in this sense.

❖ Commentary

We have adopted α₁'s readings of lauḷī and lauḷika as the name of this practice in verses 2.34–35 and 2.22 respectively. The vast majority of manuscripts, including α₂, and the most important testimonia support naulī or nauliḥ but the names lauḷika and lauḷikī do occur in some more recent works, such as the Haṭhayogasamhitā (p. 4), Gheraṇḍasamhitā (1.12), Yogasārasaṅgraha (pp. 54–55) and Yogakarṇikā (p. 56). The root lul, “roll”, provides an etymology for lauḷī and the change to naulī can be explained by the similarity in Bengali scripts of la and na (we thank Lubomír Ondračka for this observation).

A video of Mahant Bālyogī Rām Bālak Dās performing lauḷī at Dīrghēśvar Mahādev, U.P. is

❖ Commentary

Manuscripts α_1 and α_2 , ε_1 , ζ_1 and π_2 have tundāgni (or a very similar reading) in the first verse quarter. This reading is also supported by all of the manuscripts collated for the published edition of the Haṭharatnāvalī. The compound tundāgni is rare in Sanskrit literature but it was likely used here because the term tunda appears in the previous verse, which explains how laulī is done. The compound tundāgni is synonymous with udarāgni, jaṭharāgni, śarīrāgni etc., which are commonly used in yoga texts to refer to the body's digestive fire. The alternative reading mandāgni ('sluggish fire') is reasonably common in contexts of stimulating poor digestion, and may have been introduced early in the transmission to replace the more unusual tundāgni.

Most witnesses and the testimonia have maulir iyaṃ in the fourth verse quarter, which expresses the idea that lauḷī was thought to be the best of the ṣaṭkarma, and the assonance of lauḷī and mauli may have been intended. The alternative reading of mūlam iyaṃ in ζ_1 and η_1 would suggest that lauḷī is necessary for the other practices, which does not seem to be the case because, according to Haṭhapradīpikā 2.21, the ṣaṭkarmas are more like therapeutic interventions.

The word bhāti is derived from bhastri (TURNER 1966: 537, entry 9424).

η_2 and other manuscripts have kuryāt savyāpasavyataḥ ('left and right') instead of recapūrau sasambhramau. Although one might infer that savyāpasavyataḥ is referring to performing the skull bellows breathing alternately through the left and right nostrils, it appears to be a secondary reading because there is no indication of what is moving to the left and right. Such a method of alternate nostril breathing is explained as a variation of kapālabhāti in the Haṭhayogasamhitā (p. 14):

इडया पूरयेद्वायुं रेचयेत्पिङ्गलाख्यया ।
पिङ्गलया पूरयित्वा पुनश्चन्द्रेण रेचयेत् ।
पूरकं रेचकं कृत्वा वेगेन न तु चालयेत् ॥

In the second verse quarter, we have adopted the reading of the α manuscripts, susambhramau ('great speed'). The compound susambhrama is not attested elsewhere as an adjective, whereas the alternative reading sasambhrama ('fast') is commonly used. We have retained susambhramau because it seems grammatically possible and is also well attested by other manuscript groups.

We have adopted the reading vikṣā in the third verse quarter, which is an emendation of α₁ and α₂'s vikṣed. The verb vikṣed is likely an error as the other yāvat clauses have been written as nominal phrases. The reading vikṣā occurs in the same verse of the six-chapter version of the Vivekamārtaṇḍa, which sometimes preserves old readings of that text.

❖ Commentary

The term uḍḍiyāṇa is spelt various ways among manuscripts of the Haṭhapradīpikā and other texts. Generally speaking, the α group have uḍḍiyāṇa, π uḍḍiyāṇa, γ and δ uḍḍiyāṇa and the ṛjotsnā uḍḍiyāṇa. Other spellings, such as uḍyāṇa and uḍiyāṇa, also occur. We have adopted the spelling of α except in cases where the metre of a verse requires otherwise, as in 2.45d (uḍḍiyāṇakah). As noted by SANDERSON (2007: 265), diverse spellings of the place by the same name occur, including Uḍḍiyāṇa, Oḍḍiyāṇa, U/Oḍiyāṇa, U/Oḍyāṇa, or U/Oḍḍayana.

❖ Commentary

As is clear in the source text, the Gorakṣaśataka, the three techniques alluded to here are mūla-bandha, jālandharabandha and uḍḍiyāṇabandha respectively (on which see chapter three).

The stem form brahma is found in various compounds in the text. We understand it to refer to Brahman, the absolute, in all instances other than brahmagranthi, where we take it to mean the deity Brahṃā. See MALLINSON 2007: 205 n. 240.

❖ Commentary

An antecedent to the idea of prāṇāyāma affecting the whole body (i.e. as far as the tips of the hair and nails) occurs in the Baudhāyanadharmasūtra (4.1.23):

आवर्तयेत्सदा युक्तः प्राणायामान्पुनः पुनः ।
 आ केशान्ताङ्गस्वाग्राच्च तपस्तप्यत उत्तमम् ॥

[The yogi] who is constantly engaged [in practice] should repeat breath retentions again and again. Extreme heat burns as far as the tips of the hair and nails.

The meaning of nirodhāvadhi is not entirely clear, but all sources and the Jyotsnā (2.49) agree on this reading. The original reading may well have been virodhāvadhi, “until it is uncomfortable”, which makes better sense but we have decided not to emend accordingly. The problem with nirodhāvadhi is that to practise kumbhaka “up to cessation (nirodha)” seems to suggest that cessation is not that of the physical breath, which by definition ceases in kumbhaka, but of the vital wind (prāṇa) within the body. By citing a verse from an unnamed text, Brahmānanda seems to understand this verse as saying that the breath should very carefully (atiprayatnena) be held as far as the extremities of the body so that it does not damage the body by exiting through the hair follicles:

हठाच्चिरुद्धः प्राणोऽयं रोमकूपेषु निःसरेत् ।
 देहं विदारयत्येष कुष्ठादि जनयत्यपि ॥

When the breath has been stopped forcefully, it flows out through the hair follicles. This destroys the body and also causes skin diseases and the like.

Both doṣaham and doṣahṛt are well attested and possible. We have favoured the former because the α reading (doṣajam) appears to be a corruption of it, and ha is from the same root as the verb in the source text (i.e. niḥanti).

❖ Commentary

The use of lagati without a locative or direct object (as found in the source text, the Gorakṣa-śataka) is supported by the paraphrase of the verse in the Haṭhatattvakaumudī (10.7). Most witnesses (including α) have the phrase kaṇṭhāt tu hrdayāvadhi, which we have understood to have the sense of a locative as it specifies the place within the body where the contact occurs.

❖ Commentary

Nearly all the manuscripts have nāḍījalodarādhātu, which is difficult to understand because of jala ('water') in this context and ā+dhātu within the compound. This reading is also present in the transmission of the source text for the verse, the Gorakṣaśataka, and most of the testimonia. Given the strength of the evidence, we have adopted the reading and understood it as a list of things in which diseases (doṣa) may occur. This is consistent with Brahmānanda's explanation (Jyotsnā 2.53). He explains ā+dhātu as samantāt ... dhātavaḥ ('the bodily constituents altogether').

Two later sources attempt to solve these problems. Some of the manuscripts of the Haṭharatnāvalī read nāḍījālo ('in the network of channels'), which makes better sense than nāḍījalo, as jala usually means water rather than bodily fluid. Brahmānanda understands jala as water that has been drunk (pitam udakam), which seems far-fetched as the site of a disease. Two old manuscripts have dare dhātu, which avoids the need to read darādhātu. If one were to conjecture nāḍījalodare, the line would mean, 'it cures diseases of the bodily constituents inside the network of channels.'

For the idea of doṣas being in dhātus see Tantrāloka 28.283cd, where Abhinavagupta says that worldly concepts arise as a result (dhātudoṣāc ca saṃsārasaṃskārās te ...). In the Īśvara-pratyabhijñānavimarśinī Abhinavagupta notes that they are also the source of physical disorders (2.15 dhātudoṣakṛtaṃ mūrccā).

The name ujjāyī may be a Prakrit form of uddhmāyī from the verb ud-dhmā, 'to blow out'. We thank Diwakar Acharya for this suggestion.

❖ Commentary

There is division between śītkām and sītkām in all the manuscript groups of the Haṭhapradīpikā (note that the likely reading in the source texts was hikkām). The result of becoming a second god of love may be connected with the sound sīt, which is said to be made during sex in the Kāmasūtra (2.7.4–19).

This verse's source texts are from Kaula tantric milieus and this is reflected in the result of becoming one with the circle of yoginīs mentioned in the next verse.

The aiśa compound bhuvimaṇḍale, which is attested at Mañjuśrīmūlakalpa 45.221, is likely the original reading here. The alternative bhūmi is well-attested and so the change may have happened early in the transmission.

❖ Commentary

The compound rasanātālumūlena is difficult to understand. In his Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā (f. 79r–79v), Sundaradeva says that the external air strikes the root of the tongue and palate and the upper part of the uvula (atra muhū (mūhū codex) rasanātālumūlāhataṃ ghaṇṭikordhva-bhāgāhataṃ bahiṣṭhāvāyuyam vidhāya pibed ity arthaḥ). More helpful are the remarks of the commentator of the Yogataraṅginī (2.39). He says that a hole or cavity (vivara) is made by the root of the palate with the help of the tongue. The yogi breathes through it (evam rasanātālumūlena rasanā jihvā tatsahāyabhūtātālumūlena kṛtaṃ yad vivaram, tena kṛtvā yaḥ yogī prāṇam anilaṃ prāṇavāyuyam pibet pūrayet, tasya yogino 'bdārdhena ṣaṇmāsena sar-varogāṇām nāśaḥ kṣayo bhavet/).

The idea of breathing through a hole between the root of the palate and tongue might have been intended by the parallel reading of the Yogacintāmaṇi: rasanātālyogena ('by joining the tongue and palate'). We have thus translated rasanātālyumūlena as 'through the tongue and root of the palate'. It could also imply that the tongue is turned up and back to touch the root of the palate to make a hole that one breathes through (when the breath is taken in through the mouth). The Kumbhakapaddhati (137ab) states this more clearly:

रसनानुस्खीकृत्य सीत्कारं कुर्वता मरुत् ।

[The yogi] turns the tongue upwards and takes in the breath while making a sīt sound.

A similar practice is also described in Śivasamhitā 3.80:

रसनां तालुमूले यः स्थापयित्वा विपश्चितः ।

पिबेत्प्राणानिलं तस्य रोगाणां संक्षयो भवेत् ॥

When the wise [yogi] places the tongue at the root of the palate and takes in the Prāṇa breath, his diseases are cured.

❖ Commentary

An antecedent to a cooling practice involving the tongue can be found in the Kaulajñānanirṇaya (6.23–24), which mentions a point between the two front teeth that is cool to touch with the tongue:

द्वौराजदन्तमध्यस्थं बिन्दुरूपं व्यवस्थितम् ।
अमृतं तं विजानीयाद्वलीपलितनाशनम् ॥
शीतलस्पर्शसंस्थाने रसनां कृत्वा तु बुद्धिमान् ।

पद्मासनं भवेत्सम्यक् सर्वपापप्रणाशनम् ॥ ६० ॥

Now bhastrikā:

If [the yogi] places the soles of both feet on the thighs, the lotus pose, which destroys all bad deeds, duly arises. (60)

There is a point located between the two ‘royal teeth’ (rājadanta). One should know this to be [the place of] nectar that destroys wrinkles and grey hair. Putting the tongue in the place cool to the touch, the wise man becomes free of wrinkles and grey hair and devoid of all diseases.

We wish to thank Shaman Hatley for the reference and translation.

Apart from α_1 , the reading śvasanam is not well attested. We have adopted it because it provides a plausible subject for the verb lagati (i.e. 'breath comes into contact with'). Most manuscripts, as well as the Ṣyotsnā, have sasvanam ('with sound'), which requires that one infer that the breath is the subject.

❖ Commentary

Only three of the collated witnesses (γ_2 , ζ_3 and δ_2) have madhyātarjanibhyāṃ (‘with the middle and index fingers’) and this reading is not well attested by the manuscripts of the source text and testimonia. To hold the nose without the middle and index fingers is consistent with the way alternate nostril breathing is done in modern yoga (e.g. Iyengar 1991: 443–444) as well as in some ritual manuals, as for instance in Sāhib Kaula’s Śyāmāpaddhati: dakṣānāmākaniṣṭhābhyāṃ vāmaṃ puṭaṃ ca niruddhya (see Hanneder: forthcoming). However, the reading of many manuscripts suggests that the nose was held by all the fingers of both hands, except the index fingers (nāsikāmadhye tarjanibhyāṃ vinā), which seems highly impracticable, or that the nose was held by only the index fingers of both hands (nāsikāmadhye tarjanibhyāṃ tathā). It is likely that scribes changed madhyātarjanibhyāṃ to madhye tarjanibhyāṃ or madhyam tarjanibhyāṃ because of the pāda break.

❖ Commentary

In the first verse quarter, we have adopted vakra (ε_1), which is close to the reading of the α group (i.e. cakram). In compound with bhāvaghnam (α_1 , α_3 etc.) and following the awakening of Kuṇḍalinī, vakra makes good sense. According to the manuscripts available to us, the reading of the Goraḥśaśataka (vajram) is not in the transmission of the Haṭhapradīpikā.

❖ Commentary

In the first verse quarter, nearly all of the manuscripts, including the α group, have gātrasamudbhūta or gātrasamudbhūtaṃ (‘arisen in the limbs/body’). Both are rather meaningless here. In the first case, the three knots are in the central channel rather than the body. In the second case, it is redundant to say that the breath retention has arisen in the body. It is possible that samyaggātra is a corruption of guṇatraya, which is attested by the manuscripts of the source text, the Gorakṣaśataka, two of the available manuscripts of the Haṭhapradīpikā (N₂₁, Bo₁) and the Haṭhasaṅketacandrikā. In the Gorakṣaśataka, it is stated clearly that each of the knots arises from one of the three guṇas: brahmagranthi from rajas (78cd), viṣṇugranthi from sattva (79cd) and rudragranthi from tamas (80cd). With the verses on bhastrā from the Gorakṣaśataka having been extracted without the context of the knots and guṇas, the meaning of guṇatrayasamudbhūtagranthitraya (‘the three knots that have arisen from the three guṇas’) appears to have been forgotten early in the transmission of the Haṭhapradīpikā and the compound altered as a result. Alternatively it could be that Svātmārāma deliberately changed the compound in order to remove the reference to the *granthi*s being produced from the guṇas.

In the first two pādas we are understanding the usually masculine pūraka and recaka to be neuter nominatives. When explaining this verse, Brahmananda (Jyotsnā 2.68) supplies the gerund krtvā with pūrakaṃ and kuryāt with recakaṃ, but it is unlikely that the author of the verse intended this.

The compound vegodghoṣaṃ is rather unusual. We have understood it according to the commentator Bālakṛṣṇa’s gloss: ‘an inhalation in which sound is produced by force’ (vegena sañjāta udghoṣo yasmin pūrake).

Witnesses of the γ and δ branches of the stemma, and Brahmananda, have ānandalilā instead of ānandamūrchā, perhaps in order to avoid the repetition of mūrchā, which is also found in the following verse.

❖ Commentary

Although the important manuscript groups, including α , have this verse on plāvanī (sometimes spelt plāvinī), there is substantial evidence to suggest that plāvanī was incorporated into the Haṭhpradīpikā and its group of eight breath retentions (kumbhaka) sometime after the text was initially composed. Firstly, in most manuscript groups, the name plāvanī is absent from the list of *kumbhaka*s in 2.44. The better-attested reading, supported by α , includes kevala as the eighth kumbhaka and omits plāvanī. Furthermore, most of the principal testimonia, namely the Haṭharatnāvalī, Yogalakṣaṇāvalī and Yuktabhavadeva, likewise include kevalakumbhaka and omit plāvanī in the list of eight *kumbhaka*s. Secondly, the heading atha plāvanī is absent from the α group and many other manuscripts. Instead, the α manuscripts have iti plāvanīkumbhakaṃ after the verse on plāvanī, which is not consistent with the other kumbhaka descriptions. Thus, plāvanī was probably not part of the text composed by Svātmārāma and was introduced at an early stage in the transmission of the Haṭhpradīpikā.

We have understood udgāramāruta to refer to the breath of eructation, i.e. the nāga breath as described in e.g. Vivekamārtaṇḍa 36.

❖ Commentary

In the first pāda, we have adopted a reading similar to that of the Vasiṣṭhasaṃhitā, which is very close to that of δ_1 (ārecyāpūrya yat kuryāt) and δ_3 (ārecyāpūrya yaḥ kuryāt) and similar to α_2 's hypometrical reading (recapūrya y[a]t kāryaḥ). It appears that the relative pronoun dropped out of the first verse quarter early in the transmission of the Hāṭhpradīpikā and scribes have tried in various ways to restore some sense, with several emending to recakāḥ pūrakāḥ kāryaḥ. Cf. MARCINOWSKA-ROSÓL & SELLMER 2021, p. 102f.

रेचकं पूरकं मुक्त्वा सुखं यद्वायुधारणम् ।

Holding the breath comfortably without exhalation and inhalation is kevalakumbhaka. This is said to be [the true] breath control. (74)

When breath retention is mastered on its own, without exhalation and inhalation, nothing in the three worlds is impossible for [the yogi]. (75)

❖ Commentary

The reading kumbhitaḥ, which is attested by α₁ and the testimonia, does not make sense here because the subject must be the yogi (prānaḥ would be unmetrical). In other texts, the word kumbhita is used to qualify the breath and means ‘retained’ (e.g. Yogabīja 94, Kumbhakapaddhati 127, Yuktabhavadēva 8.32 etc.).
